It can be hard to know what size clothes to buy when you have a baby. Should you get the next size up? Buy clothes that will fit for a few months, then stop buying new ones? What if your baby is in between sizes or about to outgrow their current clothes? In this blog post, we provide 6 tips on how parents should purchase clothing for their growing babies.

Size doesn't matter

When you go to buy new clothes for your baby, it can be hard to know whether or not they will fit into the next size up. A good rule of thumb is even though you might want to get an outfit with long sleeves so it lasts longer, don't worry about purchasing things too big because you'll eventually need it anyway when winter comes around. In most cases, as babies grow, they wear the same clothes for a longer period.

Use your baby's current clothes as a guide

When you buy new clothes for your child, it's helpful to look at what they already have and use that as a reference point. Most clothing brands produce different sizes based on age, so knowing where your baby stands within the sizing chart of a specific brand can help determine which size to purchase next. For instance, buying more girls ruffle shorts from the same company as before but changing the size as your baby grows. Doing so saves time and money while keeping your child looking stylish.

Ignore the baby clothes size labels

As previously stated, babies' clothing size labels, especially those for newborns and infants, can vary from country to country or even between manufacturers. For example, a US newborn might require 1-2-month-old sizing for their wardrobe whereas a size EU50 will do just fine. Since babies have very sensitive skin which isn't yet completely developed, the best thing to do is compare their measurements with those given on a chart before deciding what's next in terms of sizes.

Clothes that fit should always be bought.

When buying clothes for your baby, it is essential to think about the near future. If you're concerned with saving money, then this is a great tip to keep in mind. For example, if your child's weight and height measurements meet the requirements for a 2T size, then go ahead and get that outfit. It might seem too big, but it will soon fit perfectly within weeks or months from now.

Shop by season

If you don't want to go overboard on spending and wish to prepare for all weather conditions, it is best to shop based on the season. This means outfits made for summer should be purchased during spring/summer and those suited for winter around fall time. By following this tip, we guarantee you won't be caught off guard when temperatures drop or rise unexpectedly.

Layer clothes rather than buying only one outfit

Last but not least, when buying new clothes for your baby, always try to think big. This is especially great if you plan on having more than one child. As babies get older, they grow out of their previous wardrobe, so it makes no sense to get only a few things because soon enough, those will become too small as well. If it's at all possible, buy childrens' clothes that have layers so you can change an undershirt or pants as needed. In this way, even if the top layer gets ruined during playtime, there's still a backup underneath.
